INTRODUCTION.

THE essence of a will is said to be threefold, namely: The testament (1) can be set aside or revoked; (2) It can affect property not in possession of the testator at the date of execution, but acquired before death; (3) It can make a representative to act for the testator when he is dead. In the twelfth century a man could not give away his freehold land by will; it was not so allowed until 1540. Even then the lawyers held that it could only affect land that was in the testator's possession when his will was made, and this remained good law until 1837; but in any case the will was revocable. It had no action until its owner died. The English will is the old Saxon Cwite. In the oldest form there was no expressed difficulty in a man giving something at the moment of writing, yet retaining possession for life. He could both give away and keep his land. Later it became impossible, since no gift took effect without delivery (seisin). This ancient doctrine is known as the post-obit gift. The second important characteristic of a will was the death-bed confession. Confession consists of three stages: contrition, the actual act of confession, and the amendment. The real purport of many of the clauses in early wills appears to be an endeavour to satisfy the priest of the dying man's real earnestness about his amendment. This amendment is in practice the undoing as far as may be of wrongs done. To this end he leaves sums for tithes forgotten, something towards the repair of the church and other like pious purposes, something for Masses for his soul.

It matters little whether or no these gifts are revocable and ambulatory, since it very rarely happens in practice that a man will recover after he has received Viaticum. Through these gifts executorship arose. The dying man is handing over to some other person certain property for the good of his soul. In the Anglo-Saxon Cwite (i.e., a saying) the post-obit gift and the last words coalesce, and have much the appearance of a more modern will. The testator provides for his kinsfolk and remembers his dependants, but it shews scarce a sign of its revocable character, or its power to give what its owner may possess in the future but does not possess at the moment. Moreover, the consent of the King was necessary and a heriot had to be paid. Growth was slow and changes very gradual. They were brought about by the following alterations made in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. (1) The King's Court condemned the post-obit gift and all dealings in land, except in certain boroughs. (2) The claim of primogeniture became arbitrary; the heir as such has nothing to do with the chattels of the dead man, which become generally the spoil of the church. (3) The church asserted her right to protect and execute the last will, and under her sway the will becomes, through foreign influence, a real testament, and the executor the dead man's representative. At length the church asserts its right to administer the dead man's goods for the welfare of his soul.

By the twelfth century a wide gulf lay between land and chattels. The land went to the heir. The lawyers of the ages of Henry II. and III. (Glanville and Bracton) allowed the church to obtain control of what was becoming a real testament, and from henceforth the Courts Christian saw to the will, and this will had executors. These were, in origin, neither Roman or English. The heir is useful. He is bound to see the executor pay the legacies; for a time he looks after the land. The executor attends to the chattels, but at the end of the Middle Ages the old Roman heres is called in England the executor. In the thirteenth century wills are usually in Latin, then in French, and in the second half of the fourteenth century English wills appear. The forms are Lego, Jeo devise, or I wyte or bequeath. The Anathema has long since passed away, but the testator's first care is not his estate, but his immortal soul and his earthly body. His soul he bequeaths to God, our Lady, and the Holy Saints. His body he gives, with a mortuary, to some church. For a long time elaborate instructions for splendid ceremonies are the rule, later the faces of the testators are set against idle pomp. Then come numerous monetary and other legacies, mostly left to pious uses, the four orders of friars, the prisons of London, the Mother Church. The repair of roads and bridges are rarely forgotten. The testator dismisses his debts and the sums owing to him with scarce a word. The later the will the more care to provide for his wife and children; the earlier it is the more the dead's part appears. He may be in sore need of Masses for his soul. A common form survives, he is "sick in body but whole in mind"—a survival this of the dying confession. Over and above the executors, powerful friends are asked to be overseers, who are to advise or assist the executor. Elaborate directions, save only for the funeral rites, are rare, and even after the Reformation much of the mediæval spirit has been preserved.

A word about probate. It was not until the age of Ranulph Glanville (temp. Hen. II.) that the Church Courts obtained control of wills. They then began to claim competence not only to decide the validity but also the power to establish it. By the thirteenth century wills were proved in the Church Courts. This idea in common with that of the executors came from abroad, and such claims to probate led to many an unseemly quarrel. For instance, Archbishop Peckham excommunicated the Bishop of Hereford for denying his jurisdiction in a case where the dead man had goods in more than one diocese. The compromise that a prerogative probate could only be rightly claimed when the deceased had more than the worth of five pounds in each of two dioceses is not very ancient.

It is necessary to a correct understanding to briefly state the procedure following upon the dying confession. After absolution, when the sick man was in extremis, the last rites of the church were administered. During his last moments the "passing bell" was tolled, and directly after his decease a solemn commendation of his soul to God followed. The death bell was then rung, the strokes indicating the age and sex of the departed. Commendation of the departed was followed by a Litany and prayer for the repose of his soul, recited either in the death chamber or the hall of his dwelling. On the evening before the funeral Vespers for the dead were recited. This office was generally known as placebo, from the first word of the Antiphon: I shall please the Lord in the land of the living (Ps. cxvi. 9). The service was said or sung after the body had been placed before some side altar in the parish church, where it lay covered with a pall and surrounded by six or eight wax lights.

On the following morning at service of Matins, the Dirige, so called from the Antiphon, Make thy way plain before my face (Ps. v. 8), was rendered in like manner. The bells of the church were tolled before the funeral, which took place after the Requiem Mass had been sung. The inhumation followed. It was succeeded by a final peal on the bells. The Trental or Month's Mind then began, and its Masses followed thirty consecutive days. Finally, the obit and anniversary with special Masses were said monthly and yearly.

A study of the following wills shews the prescribed order of services prior to the Reformation. Nor did it even then entirely cease, since communion services at funerals have never been altogether omitted in the Church of England; and in the exequies of the wealthy, especially of Peers and Prelates, there has been no lack of wax-lights and embroidered palls, bells, and other ceremonies, or in the provision of mourning for those who attended, although that attendance was no longer for the pious purpose of praying for the soul of the deceased. Recognition of the Mother Church of the Diocese died out, as of course did specified legacies to the lights of the church and the ornaments of the altars, but their place was partially taken by some small legacy to the repair of the church and for mending of highways and of bridges. At one period the pomp of post-Reformation funerals became so marked and the expense so great, that in many cases a limitation was placed upon the expenditure, and the testator desires to be buried simply—a sensible and wise provision. The attendance of a herald is now rare: hatchments are out of fashion. The bearing of the dead man's arms and banner are no more. Gradually a sane theory as to the disposal of the departed is growing in favour, though much needless expense is still incurred.

The name of Wayman in the Teutonic form Wigmund occurs in England as early as A.D. 725, in which year a prelate of that name was Abbot of Worcester; half-a-century later another Wigmund filled the See of York, and from 895—910 another was Bishop of Lichfield. The name is cognate with Wigmaer, Wymarc or Wilhomarc, one of whom was Abbot of Westminster in the year 969. The name is of Scandinavian origin, and frequent not only in Norway, Sweden and Denmark, but along the coast line of the North Sea as far south as Normandy. In England the Domesday Book shews branches of the family settled in Bedfordshire, Berkshire, Essex, Herts, Oxon and Suffolk. In Fressingfield, in the last-named county, Robert, son of Wimare, held six carucates of land in the time of King Edward, while in Groton in the same county

Roger de Orber encroached upon his lands. In Lincolnshire one Wymound was an under-tenant of Count Alan, another held his land of Ivo Taillegeboss. Others of the name occur among the men of the Bishop of Bayeaux and Robert of Poitou. At Corton in Suffolk, Geoffrey Wymer held lands in the time of King John, and at Ipswich, some time later, a Wimund, son of Eadmund le Cartere, held land in the parish of St. Nicholas. At Freston in Suffolk the prior and convent of Snapes granted land by an undated charter to Wimund the chaplain. The most famous Suffolk owner of the name was Wimer the chaplain, who supervised, together with Bartholemew de Glanville and Robert de Valoynes the erection of Orford Castle, as appears by the Pipe Rolls 12—30 Hen. II., 1165—1184. During the years 1177—1179 he was sheriff of the county, and as such saw to the repair of the Castle of Eye. In the year 1201-2 he was the King's Justiciar, and died Vicar of Orford, a man of many parts. The name of Robert Wymound figures among the bailiffs of the town of Cambridge in the reigns of Henry III. and Edward I., especially from 1270—1284. Then in 1306 Adam Wymond was one of the representatives of the Borough of Orford in Parliament. A William Wymund lived in Surrey in 1317, a Nicholas Wyman at Haylesham in 1342; a John Wymer at Shottisham in Suffolk in 1318, and William Wayman occurs at Little Torrington, co. Devon, in 1257. Such notices could be largely extended. At a later date, viz., in 1526, Richard Wayman held considerable estates in the counties of Hereford and Worcester, and Thomas Wenman alias Wayman, Esq., possessed yet wider estates in Norfolk, Sussex and Worcester temp. Elizabeth. Katherine Weymound, a rich Suffolk widow, owned lands in Monks Soham, Bedford and Wingfield, while the very early form of the name was represented in the same county by Edward Wimarke, who flourished about 1588.

This summary confirms the information supplied by the following wills, and will help the student to understand the forms the name has taken. In the wills here given we meet with the following variants: Wymond, Wymonde, Wimond, Weymond, Wiyman, Wijman, Wiman, Wymant, Wymont, Wymont, Weyman, Weaman, Whayman, Wheighman, Wayman, Waymon, Wayne-man, Wainman, Winman and Wenman. The various families were scattered along the coast from Yorkshire to Cornwall, penetrating inland from the fenland district through Cambridgeshire, Bedfordshire and Oxford into Berkshire. Several place names are derived from early squatters, such as Wymondham, Wymondhale, Wymondley and Wymondestane. They appear to have been an energetic race of yeomen and freeholders, though by no means neglectful of commerce, more than one wealthy merchant founding a successful business in London; and in such cases the wills, if early, are usually of much interest. One or two shew a love of books, and one at least collected botanical and natural history specimens. As a family they were unusually careless about the pronunciation and spelling of their surname, and in the dialect of East Anglia the same indifference is still to be found, the rustic speech rarely discriminating between Wayman and Wenman, using the two names synonymously.

The following wills of the Wayman family shew not only that many of the family had riches sufficient to require probate in the Archbishop's Court, but that the wills of quite humble testators, if they died on the high seas in the forces of the Crown, were also proved in the Prerogative Court. In one will at least the custom of London is followed, by which, in accordance with very ancient precedent, dating back to our Saxon forefathers, the property of the deceased was divided into three portions: the widow's part, the bairn's part, and the dead man's part.

The series now printed serves a useful purpose in presenting much of interest in the manners and customs of our forefathers, and its value to genealogists and interest to members of the family are obvious. If the evil that men do lives after them, it may be as well to be reminded that there is another side to the picture—that for good or evil personality is indestructible and the human ego immortal. Even though dead, buried and forgotten, it influences the coming ages to the end of time, and perhaps after—who knows?

Soul to God. To Cavendishe, Countess of Oxford, and her heirs my Estate at Harley in Clifton, co. Notts, bought of Francis Brown, and £500. To George Mason of Eaton, Esq., and Abell Smith, Junior, Banker, my estates in Edwinstowe, Laneham, Dunham and Mansfield Woodhouse, co. Notts, in trust to pay my wife Ellen the issues and rents during her life, and after her death to convey my Estate in Edwinstowe to William Cavendish Bentinck, Marquis of Titchfield, and his heirs, together with all my paintings, prints, looking-glasses, and the chairs and furniture of my best parlour, and the coppers, brewing vessels, etc., in my house at Edwinstowe. To my nephew William Wenman my estate in Mansfield Woodhouse.
My estates in Laneham and Dunham to be sold by the said trustees, and after the expenses, etc., deducted, the remainder to be divided among the children of my late brother the Rev<sup>d</sup> George Wenman. By deed dated June 1711 I set aside with John Farr, my wife's brother, now living, and Henry Farr, her uncle, long since dead, £900 to the use of myself, my wife and children. And whereas we have only one daughter, Margaret Heartley, who in a very unkind and indiscreet manner disposed of herself in marriage to one Mr Abel Bartley, without our consent or approbation, I desire in lieu my trustees to deduct from my estate £1,200 and pay the interest to my daughter during life, as I do not desire she should want bread, and invest it in Chancery for the benefit of her child or children. If the said Abel refuse the conditions, the sum to pass, half to John Farr, half the children of my brother George. My printed books to be placed in the Library at

THE ASSOCIATION OATH ROLLS

OF THE

BRITISH PLANTATIONS,

A.D. 1696.

EDITED BY WALLACE GANDY.

With a study of the political situation in the colonies at the end of the XVII. Century, and with two facsimiles of the Rolls.

Early settlers in New York, Virginia, Barbados, Bermudas, Antigua, Nevis, Montserrat, Antego, and on the Continent at Rotterdam, the Hague, Dort, Malaga and Geneva signed the Rolls: a remarkable record.

"A contribution of unimpeachable authenticity to the story of the period . . . Of considerable value to those who are interested in tracing the descent of the old Colonial families."

A few copies only, £3 3s. 0d. nett.
